The Temple of Venus Genetrix is a ruined temple in the Forum of Caesar, Rome, dedicated to the Roman goddess Venus Genetrix, the goddess of motherhood and domesticity. It was dedicated to the goddess in 46 BCE by Julius Caesar.

Caesar originally planned to build the temple to Venus Victrix, but the Battle of Pharsalus in 48 BC postponed the construction. He decided to dedicate his own temple to Venus Genetrix as the mother of Aeneas, considered the ancestor of the gens Julia to which Caesar belonged.

The temple was built of solid marble with eight columns (octastyle) on the façade on a raised podium ascended by two small lateral staircases. The temple treasure (now long vanished) included a statue of Venus, as well as statues of Julius Caesar; numerous works of art, including Greek paintings; six collections of engraved gems; a breastplate decorated with pearls from Britannia; and, at one time, a statue of Cleopatra as the goddess Isis.
